

Plagiarism & referencing

Plagiarism is using the ideas, words or findings of others without acknowledging them as your source of information or inspiration. It is a form of cheating and is treated very seriously in Higher Education. In order to avoid plagiarism you need to use a referencing system to acknowledge other people's ideas etc. Referencing like this may be different to what you have been used to doing but if you do not reference properly, you can be accused of plagiarism, called before the cheating board and if found guilty, in extreme cases, be withdrawn from the course. In less extreme cases you may be given a mark of zero for the plagiarised items you have produced.

How to avoid plagiarism

Always note down exactly the source of information when you are making notes. The title, author, page number, publisher and date, and place of publication should be clearly written at the top of your page of notes.

If you are to claim that a piece of work is your own, then you must acknowledge the source of any ideas that are not your own. You must also show the source of any direct quotations – these are word for word quotations placed within quotation marks " ". You must also acknowledge the source of indirect quotations – that is material that you are quoting but which has been changed into your own words, paraphrased, or summarised.

You must be careful to record the sources of all your information when you take notes. If your work is not adequately referenced, you may be accused of plagiarism and have your work disqualified.

Referencing:

Why reference?

- To verify the source of the ideas and theories in your assignments
- To demonstrate that you have researched the topic
- To enable other interested readers (and yourself) to find and use your original sources
- To show that you have read a range of sources, and to indicate whether you have used the original work (the primary reference) or whether you are just referring to a citation in someone else's work (secondary referencing)
- Marks given for an assignment partly reflect your understanding of the topic – by using someone else's words and ideas, it is difficult for your tutor to judge your understanding and to award your work an appropriate mark

What should I reference?

Anything you use that has been produced by someone else must be referenced. This includes not just books and journal articles but also radio and television programmes, official documents, information found on the Internet, letters and newspapers. As new forms of communications develop, so does the list of items to be referenced. Anything from these sources may be used in your work, but they must be correctly referenced.

How do I reference?

To make it easy for people to check references a number of referencing systems have been developed, the two used at Worcester University (except in the Psychology department) are the Harvard system and the numeric system. If you are not sure which referencing system your department uses, check with your tutors or see your subject handbook. The most important thing to remember about referencing your work is to be clear, accurate and consistent.

Referencing systems – an overview

In the Harvard system you include the author's surname and year of publication in brackets within the body of your work (you add the page number if using a quote). At the end of your essay you make a reference list of the sources you have used. You can also add a bibliography at the end of your assignment which will list other sources of information that you have used as background, but have not drawn directly from. For more detailed guidance see the online Harvard Referencing Guide available on the study skills website (www.worcester.ac.uk/studyskills) or your tutor.

In the numeric system you use a number after each quote or paraphrase, and then give the details of where to find it in a reference list (endnote list) at the end of your essay. Your reference list will only refer to the sources that you have actually cited. You can also add a bibliography at the end of your assignment which will list other sources of information that you have used as background, but have not drawn directly from. For more detailed guidance see online Numerical Referencing Guide available on the study skills website (www.worcester.ac.uk/studyskills) or your tutor.

NB: Check with your tutors if you are not sure which referencing system your department uses

Glossary of terms:

Bibliography: An alphabetical list found at the end of an assignment which lists sources of information that you have used as background, but have not drawn directly from.

Citation/reference: an entry that gives precise details of the original source of the information used.

Paraphrase: putting someone else's ideas into your own words.

Quotation: directly copying someone else's words.

Reference list: a list of sources that have been cited in an assignment
